

Douglas' Long Paint Line Sprays 6400 Parts Hourly

The longest continuously moving paint line of its kind in the world is in operation at the Torrance plant of the Douglas Aircraft Company.

Capable of painting 6400 jet parts in an hour, the assembly line painters will work on parts for the F4D Skyray jet interceptor, the Navy's fastest airplane, and other Navy planes. The automatic paint line is an electrically-driven overhead monorail system operating at 10 to 30 feet per minute. In its half-mile length, the conveyor takes parts from five production locations for painting. In a 378-foot tunnel divided into chambers, the parts move through twelve automatic phases—washing, rinsing, and various chemical treatments.

Hung on Loops

Parts varying in size from an inch square to six feet long are hung on squeeze-type loops suspended at four-inch intervals along the painting system.

Paint is "flow coated" on the parts, with a fan-like action from nozzles on the sides and bottoms of the processing chamber. This assures uniform painting, officials say.

If fire breaks out, the system would automatically stop, all fans and blowers would halt, the paint flow ceases, and heat sources stop. At the same time, carbon dioxide would spray into sumps and closed drains.

Hurst to Take Course At European Air Base

Airman Third Class Arthur J. Hurst, son of Mr. and Mrs. Carl M. Hurst, of 3805 W. 180th St., Los Angeles, has completed the academic phase of training in a medical technician course and will receive "on-the-job" training at an Air Force installation in Europe.

The initial part of training was given at Brooks Army Medical Center, Tex. After graduation, Hurst will be qualified to give bedside care to patients.
